STEADI Fall Prevention Training

This course was developed by the ISU Translational Research Network (U-TuRN) to provide training and support on the use of community-based fall risk screening in older adults. The course is based on a Practicum course developed in the Department of Kinesiology to train students on adult fitness assessment and programming, but was converted to an online course to enable use by clinicians and community-based organizations.

The course follows guidelines from the established CDC STEADI protocols and was designed in collaboration with the Iowa Falls Prevention Coalition and the Iowa Community HUB to foster standardized approaches for clinical and community-based fall risk screening in Iowa.

The course is online and self-guided. The course includes a series of short video-based modules, online links and integrated learning activities that will provide the foundational training and skills needed to conduct fall risk screening following the STEADI protocol. As with any skill, mastery requires ongoing practice. Therefore, the course should be viewed as a foundational experience and additional practice is recommended prior to implementing in community-based settings.

It is important to emphasize that the course only covers the basics for administering the protocols. Clinical expertise from physical therapists and physicians is needed to help individuals identify underlying risks or medical conditions that may contribute to fall risk. Therefore, screening should be viewed as a preliminary step in helping to prevent falls in older adults.
